This article discusses and analyzes the rule of international law which declares invalid any treaty which is imposed by the threat or use of aggressive military force against a contracting state. The twentieth century development of the rule is examined by surveying the doctrine, state practice, international legislation and jurisprudence of the inter-war and post-World War II periods. In conclusion, the author sets out the existing rule, problems related to its present status, and additional suggestions for clarifying and developing the rule.
